

THE DRIVERS'TEST CRID SHEET

Almost license-renewal time?

Not ready to take the damned written exam?

Look what we've got for you!

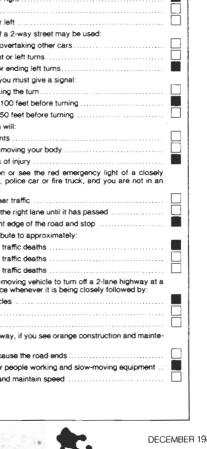

Now, let's be honest. If the DMV didn't want us to cheat on our written driving tests, it wouldn't give them back to us corrected, right? And when it comes to the rules of the road, most motorists, with the possible exception of mothers and masochists, would gladly pore over a friend's previously taken test rather than plow through the California Driver's Handbook.

But if things are as easy as they sound, how come almost 25 per cent of the test takers—both novices and hard-core drivers—flunk on round one? Because the DMV is not that naive; it administers five different tests that are revised periodically ("every two to four years," according to a DMV spokesperson), and of late the department has become rather bullish on the more obscure sections of the Handbook as well as the latest changes in the California Vehicle Code. (One veteran CHP officer frankly admitted recently that he flunked the test badly. "The questions are silly," he complained to the examiner. "This just isn't the way we interpret the law on the road.")

Well, in the spirit of Christmas and good will toward motorists, we offer our readers this gift: the five drivers'-license tests currently being given by the DMV. However, don't think it will be smooth sailing from now on. We can't predict when the next revision will take place or the next road rule be changed. And remember—if you fail, don't blame us.
